Caprylic / Capric Triglyceride (Medium Chain Triglycerides)

Coconut Fatty Acids or MCTs are not like most fats we consume. Most dietary fat (97%) is made up of Long Chain Triglycerides (LCTs), consisting of 14-18 carbon atoms per chain. MCTs on the other hand are shorter, consisting of 6-12 carbon atoms per chain. Because of this difference in structure, the two fats have vastly different properties and this makes MCTs easier to absorb and rapidly converts into fuel to utilize instead of being stored as fat

Medium Chain Fatty Acids contain between 6 and 12 carbon chains:

6:0	Caproic Acid	Coconut Fatty Acid
8:0	Caprylic Acid	Coconut Fatty Acid
10:0	Capric Acid	Coconut Fatty Acid
12:0	Lauric Acid	Key Fatty Acid of Coconut Oil

Saccharide Isomerate (Moisture Sphere)

Dry, itchy skin is a warning from the body that the protective function of the epidermis is not coping with the demands made on it. Although age remains an important factor in dry skin, environmental factors play a greater role. Heating, air conditioning, traveling by plane and harsh weather conditions all have detrimental effects as they expose skin to extreme and rapid changes in humidity. Such rapid changes represent a severe challenge to the biosensor function of the skin. Frequent exposure to detergents and chemicals further reduce the ability of the skin to maintain its natural barrier, causing it to become dehydrated. In healthy skin, water loss is regulated by the outermost layer of the epidermis, the stratum corneum.
